The diagram below breaks the responsibilities of a professor into three major modules, Teaching, Research, and Service. Each of those modules is then broken into smaller modules, and this process is continued until each submodule represents a fairly specific responsibility with reasonably well defined activities associated with it.

On back of this page, sketch a similar diagram that displays the responsibilities of a student in modular form. Assume nothing about a student’s particular major or schedule; instead, separate an average student’s responsibilities into categories and sub-categories.

Your diagram should contain at least 24 modules (the diagram above contains 36).

In order to make your assignment as readable as possible, it is recommended that you sketch an early draft on scratch paper before committing your final draft to the back of this page.